

KSOM Primary Care Program

Keck School of Medicine
of USC

USC offers student unparalleled opportunities to experience healthcare in underserved, socioeconomically disadvantaged, and otherwise at-risk populations. PCP allows students to become fully immersed in these and other populations by engaging with the primary care clinics that provide for these communities.

“I witnessed the importance of primary care firsthand as we caught our patient's conditions first, and developed deep long-term relationships with them. This added to my medical school experience and I learned more about primary care career paths. KSOM PCP definitely fulfilled my desire to work in an outpatient, primary care setting. “

“One of the best aspects of the program is being connected with like-minded students who are passionate about primary care, global health, mental health, and social justice issues, aka the "humanities" side of medicine.”

“PCP is well-run, well-structured, challenging, and effective program. It is a positive experience. “

“My PCP mentor has been fantastic in guiding me through questions relating to primary care, medical school, residency programs, and life in general.”

“PCP does not take up that much extra time from school. I have plenty of time to participate in extracurricular activities and have as balanced of a lifestyle as I want.”
